This image displays a comprehensive color calibration target consisting of 200 individual color patches. The patches are organized into a grid of approximately 16 rows and 13 columns, with the final row containing only four patches. Each patch is a small square with a unique color or grayscale tone, labeled with a number from 1 to 200. The sequence begins with primary colors like blue, cyan, magenta, and yellow, followed by a wide range of skin tones, greens, oranges, and reds. It also includes a series of grays for density and contrast calibration, ending with more saturated colors and additional skin tones. This type of chart is used to ensure color accuracy across different imaging systems and printing processes.
